Tevfik Rueştue Bey, Minister of Foreign Affairs, accompanied by his wife and a suite composed of officials of his ministry, arrived at Bucarest on May 11 for the ostensible purpose of returning the visit which the Rumanian Foreign Minister had paid to Ankara some time ago. The visit was marked by the usual ceremonies, including luncheon with King Carol, and was made the occasion for the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of arbitration and conciliation concluded on October 17, 1933. As mentioned elsewhere, the fact that the Turkish and Rumanian foreign ministers, after conferring together, found it desirable to confer also with the Yugoslav Minister of Foreign Affairs and went together to Belgrade on May 13 for that purpose is taken to mean that this visit involved something more than similar formal visits exchanged between Balkan statesmen in the recent past have involved. As also mentioned elsewhere, the fact that the Turkish Foreign Minister, in talking to the Rumanian press, made a reference to the special Straits régime has been looked upon as indicating that at Bucarest the Minister took up actively the matter of ending this special Straits régime and that this was the subject which decided him and his Rumanian colleague to journey together to Belgrade. It has been heard said that Turkey is most anxious to obtain from the other three parties to the Balkan Pact support in pushing at Geneva the matter of a Turkish free hand in the Straits Zone and that the party primarily interested, because of its geographical position, and therefore most likely to withhold support is Rumania. Hence, observers conclude, the Turkish Foreign Minister, who while visiting Bucarest was on his way to Geneva, very probably raised this Straits question in the hope of obtaining some assurance that might serve as a basis for his conversations with western statesmen.
